European Journal of Developmental Science

Dedicated to the Interdisciplinary Study of Human Development

Individual human development is influenced by a multitude of systems, ranging from cultural processes, genetic and physiological incidents up to social interactions. How do these systems cooperate and interact during the course of human development? One of the main goals of Developmental Science is finding an answer to this question! Because it exceeds the means of researchers from certain scientific disciplines to investigate the simultaneous biopsychosocial changes of systems and how they jointly contribute to the social and adaptive functions of human individuals, Developmental Science is necessarily an interdisciplinary endeavour. As an interdisciplinary approach the goal of Developmental Sciences is to comprehend the development of individuals with different cultural and ethnic as well as biological background, different economic and cognitive potentials living under diverse conditions.

The European Journal of Developmental Science provides an interdisciplinary and international forum for basic research and professional application in the field of Developmental Science. It aims to bring together work by researchers across different subdisciplines within psychology, as well as across other disciplines such as Psychology, Anthropology, Biology, Communication Science, Neuroscience, Linguistics, Medical Science, Ethology, History, Philosophy and Sociology. The reader will find original empirical or theoretical contributions, methodological papers and reviews, giving a systematic overview or evaluation of research and theories of Developmental Science dealing with normative human development as well as developmental psychopathology during infancy, childhood, adolescence and adulthood.

All manuscripts pass through a multilevel peer-review process. The journal is available as print and online version.
